

Curiosity, Resilience, and the Road Ahead

"The man who removes a mountain begins by carrying away small stones."

Early Life

My early life began in the 21st century, a time they call the age of technological revolution and globalization. Yet, for me, it was shaped not by screens and speed, but by simplicity, curiosity, and a quiet sense of wonder.

I grew up in a middle-class conservative Muslim family, where love often spoke in silence. My school journey began at a Madrasah called Tazkiatul Ummah Cadet, and even now, my heart lingers there. Those were golden days—not because they were perfect, but because they were pure.

If I close my eyes, I can still see it: my black cycle. It was more than rusted steel and two wheels. It was my wings before I knew I could fly. That cycle was my dream at an age when dreams had no names—only feelings.

It is said that childhood is a hurried life we only understand when it's too late. Maybe that's a quiet tragedy. But also, it's an enduring gift. Because even now, when the world moves too fast, a part of me still rides that black cycle—slowly, gently, endlessly.

College Life

In 2021, after the Corona pandemic, the world entered a new chapter. Everything felt different. During that period, I stepped out more into city life. My eyes opened to many new experiences.

Chawkbazar, a well-known place for students, became my second home during my intermediate years. College life introduced a new stage of independence and responsibility.

It was not only about academic learning but also about personal growth. I encountered new perspectives, built friendships, and faced intellectual challenges that broadened my thinking. Balancing studies, expectations, and future planning became part of my daily life.

One year from Now On:

- Evolve: Becoming a version of myself that aligns with my highest standards.
- Communicate: Mastering English through an IELTS course for global mobility.
- Analyze: Decoding the complex forces of geopolitics and global economics.

Running & Dream Life

Life is a continuous journey, much like running. Every step forward requires effort, patience, and determination. After completing my intermediate studies, I began my university life at the University of Chittagong in the Department of Economics.

Economics is often called a “royal subject” because it is deeply connected with the real world. There is hardly any place where economics does not exist. My present life revolves around working toward progress while staying focused on my long-term dreams. Dreams guide and motivate me. Challenges are unavoidable, but I remain determined to turn my dreams into reality.
