

Steps of Growth and Silent Determination

A river cuts through rock not because of its power, but because of its persistence.

Early Roots

I grew up in a simple environment where dreams were larger than circumstances. Life was not always easy, but it was meaningful. From childhood, I learned that small efforts matter. Every lesson from school, every discussion at home, and every personal challenge shaped my mindset. I was naturally curious. I asked questions—about society, people, and how the world works. That curiosity slowly turned into a deep interest in understanding economic realities around me. Even as a student, I noticed how prices changed, how people struggled, and how opportunities were not equal for everyone. Those early observations planted a quiet ambition inside me. Failures visited me, too. But instead of discouraging me, they strengthened my patience. I learned that setbacks are not endings—they are instructions.

A Changing World

The post-pandemic world felt different. When everything paused, I realized the value of time, health, and preparation. I became more serious about my studies, and discipline became my strength. During college, I learned independence and responsibility. Managing time, handling academic pressure, and speaking confidently helped me grow. At the University of Chittagong, studying Economics changed my perspective. I understood that economics is not just theory—it reflects real-life challenges, inequality, and policy decisions.

Milestone To Reach

- Strengthen my academic foundation in Economics.
- Improve my communication and analytical skills.
- focus on long-term goals instead of short-term distractions.

Dreams in Motion

Life is not a straight road; it is full of turns and unexpected detours. But dreams act like a compass. I aspire to contribute meaningfully to society through knowledge and research. My goal is not only personal success but also positive impact. I remind myself that progress is built daily—through reading, learning, observing, and improving.
